"A charming domestic tale, told in the first person, with a simplicity and power that reminds one forcibly of the style of Dickens's inlimitable 'old woman' in Bleak House. The story is one of deep interest, which cannot fail of exerting a highly beneficial influence more its readers, expecially should they happen to be placed in some pon its readers, especially should they happen to be placed in some upon its readers, especially abould they happen to be placed in some of those trying circumstances which all are occasionally subject to, and which have a tendency to make us repine at our lot, and sometimes even cavil at the wise dispensations of Providence. To all such we would say, look at these orphaned children, and endeavor to en uiste their fortitude under trials of the most aggravated nature; and, while learning from them the duty of submission, draw encouragement also from the contemplation of the reward they ultimately respect."

The following is a brief synogeis of expressed opinions:

"Cornelius Vroman may be said to vegetate only; his power of appreciating is at zero; he is in circulation and nerve-power below the oyster or the tuttle barrely weallowing when fold is put into his mouth, and standing when placed upon his feet. His pulse rances from fifty to ninerty and his erosation is almost nothing. Fine and needles may frequently be stock into his field, and be evinces no feeling. The temperature of his body cannot be neasily over sixty detrees. All this is wonderful and true. My own views, and those of Dr. Reese and Professor Carnochan, are similar.
